CALL FOR STUDENT APPLICATIONS

Description

This full-year course provides 5 students unprecedented engagement with many of the most significant energy lawyers, regulators, producers, stakeholders and academics from around the world. Through this engagement, students are offered an insider's perspective into the challenges facing policy makers today. Classes are conducted on campus and at other sites (including various locations internationally, such as energy facilities, energy regulators, and various offices of Dentons LLP).

Flights, hotels and a meal per diem are provided for all student travel.

In these constructed learning environments, students discuss the energy policy challenges with energy stakeholders and experts in a way that marries academic insights with real-world wisdom. By engaging with the upper echelons of policy communities, students will expand their insight into energy law and policy.

Students are required to use this knowledge to write and present a Policy White Paper Report on a selected energy law and policy issue. Their presentations will be made to a panel of energy experts, who will judge and critique the student's work. An award will be presented by Dentons Canada LLP for the top policy presentation. In preparation, students will have a half-day workshop session with a seasoned policy advocate, so they can learn how to maximize the impact of their policy message.

By providing students the ability to translate this energy knowledge into policy action, and by connecting students with elite policy actors, this course grants our students a genuine opportunity to become the leaders who will make the critical energy policy decisions which will impact the lives of Canadians tomorrow.

The majority of classes will be held in the first semester. During the second semester classes will be scheduled so as to allow students to enroll in Law 599.01: Legal Practice: Project Management should they wish to do so.
